May 2026

PNIMA Israel — Service for All

A New National Framework for Shared Responsibility and Social Cohesion

Executive Summary

The question of national service has become one of the most defining and sensitive challenges facing Israeli society today. Deep inequalities in participation have eroded the sense of shared responsibility that once stood at the center of Israeli civic life, contributing to growing social fragmentation and political tension.

PNIMA's "Service for All" model seeks to address this challenge through a comprehensive and realistic framework that ensures every young person in Israel can contribute meaningfully to society. By creating multiple pathways for service that reflect the diversity of Israeli society while maintaining a shared civic foundation, the model aims to rebuild a sense of collective responsibility and strengthen social cohesion.

The Challenge

For decades, Israel has struggled to establish a broadly accepted model for national service. Structural gaps, particularly regarding ultra-Orthodox and Arab communities, have created a system that is widely perceived as unequal, undermining both legitimacy and participation.

At the same time, Israel faces increasing security demands alongside evolving economic needs, requiring broader engagement from across society. The absence of an agreed-upon framework not only weakens the "shared burden" principle, but also deepens divisions between communities and limits opportunities for integration and mobility.

Our Solution

The "Service for All" model is built on the understanding that a sustainable solution must be both inclusive and adaptable. Rather than relying on a single uniform pathway, it introduces a diversified system of service options that includes military service, civil-national service, and technological or professional tracks.

This structure enables broader participation while allowing individuals to serve in ways that are aligned with their abilities, identities, and life circumstances. At the same time, it preserves a shared civic framework that reinforces the idea of collective contribution.

A central element of the model is the integration of service with long-term opportunity. In particular, technological and professional service tracks are designed to equip participants, especially those from underserved communities, with relevant skills, training, and pathways into meaningful employment, thereby linking national service with social mobility and economic inclusion.

Impact to Date

In recent years, PNIMA has played a significant role in advancing this model within public and policy discourse, engaging closely with decision-makers and stakeholders across the political spectrum. Elements of the model have already influenced national discussions and appeared in policy frameworks, reflecting growing recognition that the current system is no longer sustainable.

At the same time, initial pilot programs, particularly in technological service tracks, have begun to demonstrate how more inclusive service pathways can operate in practice, expanding participation and creating tangible opportunities for young people from diverse backgrounds.

Strategic Vision

Looking ahead, the goal is to establish a comprehensive national service framework that balances Israel's security, economic, and social needs. This includes significantly expanding participation across all sectors of society, strengthening the connection between service and future opportunity, and rebuilding a shared civic ethos that can serve as a foundation for long-term cohesion.

Such a framework has the potential not only to resolve a longstanding policy challenge, but to become a central pillar in strengthening Israeli society as a whole.

Funding Opportunity

Support for this initiative will first and foremost enable the advancement of the model within national policy frameworks, working toward broad-based adoption and the creation of a sustainable, government-backed service system that reflects shared responsibility across Israeli society.

In parallel, it will support the continued development and implementation of service pathways on the ground, including close work with implementing partners, expansion of pilot programs, and refinement of models that connect service with skills development and employment opportunities.

Finally, support will enable the scaling of the model to reach additional populations and sectors, expanding access to meaningful service opportunities while strengthening the overall system's capacity and impact. Together, these efforts will ensure that the model evolves from a policy proposal into a practical and widely adopted national framework.

Why It Matters

A shared service framework is one of the most powerful mechanisms for building a shared society. By creating opportunities for meaningful contribution across all communities, it strengthens social cohesion, supports national resilience, and helps rebuild a sense of collective purpose in Israel.